The Depository Library Program Bringing Government Information to You.

Information from the Federal Government on subjects ranging from agriculture to zoology is available at Depository Libraries around the United States and its territories. Each working day, Federal agencies provide these libraries with valuable information that can be used by everyone from students to government leaders.

These libraries participate in the Depository Library Program established by Congress to allow the public free access to Government publications. Each year Depository Libraries select titles from a list of more than 6,000 categories of publications. Fifty regional Depository Libraries receive every unclassified Government publication of interest to the public and have undertaken the responsibility of retaining this material permanently, on paper or microfiche.

Inter-library loan and reference services are also provided.

The Depository Library Program originated in the early 1800's when a joint resolution of Congress directed that additional copies of the House and Senate Journals and other documents be printed and distributed to institutions outside the Federal establishment. Over the years the Depository Library System has expanded and today there are nearly 1,400 participating libraries.

You can visit these Depository Libraries and use the Federal depository collection. You'll find these collections filled with information on careers, gardening, business opportunities, health and nutrition, government, solar energy, and countless other subjects. To find the Depository Library in your area, contact your local library or write to the Superintendent of Documents, Washington, DC 20402. And while you're visiting your Depository Library, take time to meet your Government Documents librarian and learn about other library services.
